

Sinclair Broadcast Group's recent actions have illustrated how special interest groups try to quiet those who disagree with them.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. Yet special interest groups seek to control what Sinclair airs, including pressuring the FCC. It is amazing that special interest groups would claim that Sinclair's ability to decide what it wants to air means that we would get " less of what we need for our democracy."

I applaud the FCC for realizing that not everyone wants to hear only one point of view.
